Most of the time, this doesn't happen because you're running into permissions problems with Windows or iCloud. More often, though, it happens because you're running into the same problem I saw again and again: your phone's iCloud backup is incomplete. This is most likely the case if your phone's storage settings say you've only got 11 percent of your stuff backed up. I've seen it with about one of every six phones I've restored. (The two other main culprits are Android phones and your iCloud password, which doesn't seem to be restored correctly.) A backup might be incomplete if you deleted some files and then restored your phone without the proper "refresh" action. The process looks like this: You delete something. You get rid of the files on your computer. You restore your phone from iCloud. If you haven't used the phone for a while, or if you're restoring it after a lengthy factory reset, your phone will look like you'd never used it before. That's because, by the time you restore it, iCloud has already deleted those files from your computer. (Apple's policy is to just trash your files unless they're important.) Fortunately, the first step in fixing it is fairly easy. To Fix a Backup: Go to your computer and open iTunes. (If you have multiple computers on your iCloud, you'll have to sign into the account in every one of them, but it's not difficult.) Open the "Summary" screen by clicking the button in the lower left. Find the "Restore Backup" section, and click it. If you get a message that says "not enough space," you can fix that, or just do it later. If you do get the message, just ignore it; iCloud's estimate is pretty low. When you restore your backup, your phone will be almost as new as it was before you deleted all of your files. Advertisement From there, things get more complicated, and it really depends on what kind of phone you have and how old it is.

Unfortunately, iCloud doesn't restore the data on your phone that is specific to that phone. If you have a new iPhone, for example, your phone won't be able to use your contacts

Treasury Undersecretary for International Affairs William Daley tells reporters that regulators have a "shared responsibility" to ensure that banks' information and know-how is shared, so that they can bolster their efforts to fight money laundering and other financial crimes. REUTERS/Eric Thayer William Daley, undersecretary for international affairs at the Treasury Department, said banks needed to share information on criminal activity, money laundering and terrorist financing with their regulatory counterparts to combat financial crime. "They will have to comply, or they will collapse the global financial system," Daley told reporters after a speech in New York to the Conference of Major Supervisors of the International Organisation of Securities Commissions. The United States, which has been urging other nations to provide more information to finance ministries, is seeking to draw global co-operation on the issue at a summit in New York on Tuesday. The U.S. government's top bank regulator, John Daley, told a global anti-money laundering conference in New York on Monday that a more open banking system would help reduce the risk of future financial crises.
